WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

A cold front currently moving through northwestern California will sweep across the region today and this evening with gusty winds and moderate to briefly heavy rain. Wind gusts along and ahead of the front could reach 40-45 mph in exposed wind-prone areas. Once the front passes, snow levels will drop to 3000-4000 feet as scattered showers continue into Saturday. The jet stream will sit over the area Sunday through Tuesday, and several more waves of moderate to heavy precipitation can be expected in far northwestern California during this time. Snow levels will be between 5000-7000 ft. Light rain and mountain snow will also be common in the remainder of the region during this time. Another storm system with colder air will reach the region on Christmas Eve and Christmas Day.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

A dissipating trough will approach the area today, which is expected to impact the area tonight into Saturday. Ahead of this system, expect warmer temperatures and locally breezy conditions in and near the Antelope Valley. Highs will reach the 40s in the mountains to the lower 70s across the valleys of Southern California. Southwest winds of 20-30 mph will be possible in the Kern County Mountains eastward to the Antelope Valley this afternoon. Late tonight, rain will move into the central part of the state, reaching Monterey County and the Sierras from Yosemite N.P. by daybreak. Rain is expected to overspread the rest of the central part of the state Saturday morning through the early afternoon. Southern California will see clouds increase through the day with light rain possible Saturday evening into the overnight hours. Precipitation amounts from this system will be quite modest overall with 0.50 – 1.00” possible across Monterey County in the Sierras northward to 0.25 – 0.50” for the rest of Central California. Southern California will see around a tenth of an inch with 0.25” possible near the higher terrain. West winds of 25-35 mph with gusts to 45 mph will be possible Saturday in the Sierras and across the deserts. The snow level will be over 5,000 feet and 4-8” of snow will occur in the Sierras with over a foot possible above 7,000 feet north of Yosemite N.P. Sunday, northerly winds of 20-30 mph will blow through the I-5 Corridor and Cajon Pass as the system shifts eastward. A few leftover showers will be possible on the north aspects of the Angeles and San Bernardino N.F.’s Sunday, but the rest of the area should see partly cloudy, but cool weather. For much of next week, pervasive northwesterly flow will continue over the state which will allow for widespread rain over the northern half of the state. Heavy rain will occur well north of the district Sunday through Tuesday, with rain falling as far south as Monterey and Fresno Counties. Southern California should see mostly sunny skies with near normal temperatures. Long range models continue to indicate a much more significant system may reach the area next Thursday night into Friday, December 25th. No offshore winds are expected through the end of next week.
